Russia is planning to open an international center offering nuclear fuel cycle services in 2007, head of the Federal Atomic Energy Agency (Rosatom) Sergei Kiriyenko told journalists in Vienna on Monday.

"We will be ready to create the conditions necessary for such a site by the end of this year," he said.

"Russia offers every country desiring the peaceful development of atomic energy to become a founder and stock-holder of the center," he said.

"Any nation will be able to receive guaranteed supplies of reduced enrichment uranium and also receive the right to participate in administering this center and to receive a share of its profits," he said.
